Different Strokes: Belonging Without Being Alike

For a long time, I thought belonging meant sameness. That to fit in was to find the people who liked what you liked, thought how you thought, saw the world through something close to your own lens. And there is comfort in that — there is real warmth in recognizing yourself in someone else.

But it is not, I've come to believe, where the deepest belonging lives.

The deepest belonging happens when you are genuinely different from the people around you — and it doesn't matter. When your approach is unusual and it is welcomed anyway. When you bring something to a room that nobody else was bringing, and instead of being asked to be more like everyone else, you are asked to bring more of it.

That is what Different Strokes means to me. Not a celebration of what we have in common, but something braver — a celebration of what we don't. Of the fact that this team is richer because no two of us arrived the same way, or see things the same way, or do things the same way.

You don't have to be quieter, louder, or more like whoever seems most comfortable in the room. Just show up as what you are. Turns out, that's exactly what is needed.

Drifting on Dreams

As I float on the hopes that the silence won't steal,
I wait for our meeting, a bond time can't heal.

Tethered by memories, fragile and thin,
Strings of the past pull me deep from within.

Though deep down I know what the end fate might be,
This stubborn heart sails on a sorrowful sea.

It whispers your name in the tides endlessly,
While longing consumes me beneath the deep sea.
